step forward in their effort to retain the Missouri "AA" football title by defeating the Versailles Tigers 32-8. The game, played at Smith-Cotton Stadium in Sedalia, was attended by supporting Cardinal fans who once again watched their Cardinal team carry off an easy victory. The title grid match in State "AA" football was lost by a great South Shelby team to the Cubs of Monett one week later at the Southwest Missouri State College in Springfield. The 37-8 defeat for the Cards didn't show their true strength. But Cardinal fans saw a determined team come back with an even greater hope to be back on top next year.

POWER IN THE COUNTRYSIDE

Country winters can be bleak and dark. Once they were.

But today, nearly a thousand consumer-owned rural electric systems maintain almost half the nation's power lines to provide light and power to some 25 million Americans — about 10 percent of the nation's consumers — in almost every part of the countryside.

Difficult tasks have always challenged the leaders of these locally-owned and locally-managed systems.

As members of the communities they serve, they're involved with community needs — a rural power demand that doubles about every seven years; a social and economic demand for jobs, housing, schools. As Americans, they're alert to the problems the country faces — resource development, regional planning, pollution. And as rural Americans, they're deeply conscious of rural America's role in our nation's progress.

All across the land, rural electric system people — working together and with others — are searching out solutions to problems created by changing social and technological pressures.

Rural electric systems are people. They must meet people needs.

They will.
